President’s Message

Happy New Year and welcome to 2013!

Looking back, 2012 was a super year for NOCALL. Our members put on informative educational programming, wrote professional articles, won awards and national elections, worked and celebrated all over California (and Boston too). 2013 looks like it is going to be another great year, so get active in NOCALL and take advantage of these opportunities to make a difference!

First and foremost, congratulations are in order for NOCALL Past President, Holly Riccio, on her election to AALL Vice President/President Elect. I had the great pleasure of working with Holly as VP during her term as NOCALL President and I truly admire and respect her abilities. I know she will be a terrific leader for the national association.

I would like to thank all the members who came to our 4 Corners celebrations in December and thanks go to the organizers, Rachael Samberg, Coral Henning, Ellen Platt, Sharon Lahey and Kerry Prindiville. Check out the photos on the NOCALL Facebook page.

NOCALL’s Business Meeting was held at Stanford Law School on January 30th. Our guest speaker was Ron Tyler, Associate Professor of Law and Director of the Criminal Defense Clinic at Stanford. Ron’s talk was “Wellness in the Practice of Law”. Ron discussed his experience in developing a wellness program for public defenders and led the assembled group of NOCALL members in an interactive wellness workshop. Thanks go to Stanford Law Librarian and NOCALL Archives Committee Chair, Rachael Samberg for arranging our meeting and speaker.

The Nominations Committee has put forward a slate of candidates for the 2013-2014 NOCALL Board. –

THE BLISS OF TECHNOLOGY... As much as we librarians (along with everyone else) sometimes feel overwhelmed by the flood of technology sweeping over us, I managed to remind myself that there are situations in which tech has made our jobs easier. I looked back 25 years to volume 80 of Law Library Journal. My favorite section was “Questions and Answers.” Librarians would write to LLJ and the answers would be provided by alternating teams of librarians from academia and law firms. (By the way, what ever happened to “Questions and Answers”?) Imagine working on these real-life questions without the aid of fully-developed technology:

• How can I find addresses and phone numbers of attorneys when I know only their names and the states they practice in? Martindale-Hubbell requires that you know the county and city where an attorney practices before you can find his or her address.

• Can you help me locate the Tokyo Round Treaty? I know that it is a treaty dealing with international trade, but I cannot find it in either Treaties in Force or Peter Rohn’s World Treaty Index.

• I have been asked to find the “Buddy Holly” law. I have tried several sources, including Shepard’s Acts and Cases by Popular Name.

• An attorney with a troubled expression came to the reference desk with a printout from Lexis and one from Westlaw. “I Shepardized this older New York case, 124 N.Y.S.2d 50, using Westlaw and did not find any subsequent history. The paralegal assigned to cite-check the brief used Shepard’s on Lexis and came up with a different answer. What am I doing wrong in my research?”

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS AGO AT NOCALL... Sharon French, President; Shirley David, Vice-President/President-Elect; Janice Kelly, Secretary; Arturo Flores, Treasurer; David Bridgman, Past President. Membership totaled 250.

DOING ANY HIRING?... Check out the January 7 issue of BusinessWeek. The article discusses how more and more companies hire employees who fit in with existing corporate culture, even if they’re less qualified. Employers don’t necessarily hire the most skilled candidates. This trend is being driven by millennials because they care about corporate culture, and smart companies understand this. “I once hired someone as a manager, and it created a lot of tension because he didn’t fit in. People tried to alienate him because they weren’t interested in him as a friend.” And it goes the other way. “I once hired a woman who really didn’t have the right background or experience for the job, but who I hit it off with during the interview. And because we got along so well I was able to train her easily and she ended up doing great things for us.”

AND FINALLY...“She’s a librarian,” Sim said. “They’re not teachers; don’t give you half as much hassle. If there’s a fire in the school and I’ve got to choose who I’m gonna save—a teacher or a librarian—the teacher’s gonna burn every time.” Keith Gray, Ostrich Boys (Random House Books for Young Readers, 2010).

CREATING A DIGITIZATION WORKFLOW FOR YOUR LIBRARY
David Holt
Heafey Law Library
Santa Clara Law

As we deal with an increasingly electronic world, the demand for digitization services by our patrons only rises. Our patrons expect electronic access to materials to meet their legal information needs. Many libraries, however, are struggling to accommodate these requests as they feel ill-equipped to make the necessary decisions required for creating a digitization workflow. This brief article will discuss some of the issues considered in this process and share some of the experiences we have had digitizing in a large academic law collection.

The first issue a library needs to consider when embarking upon a digitization effort is whether these services will be done “in-house” or contracted out to third parties. If a library has only a small collection of materials to scan, it may be unwise to purchase digitization equipment as the return on investment will be too low. There are a number of companies that provide digitization services, some of them at a surprisingly low cost. A company in San Jose, for example, will scan monographs at a cost of $1 for every 100 pages.1 The reason, however, why the price is so low is because this is “destructive book scanning” meaning that the spine is removed from the book and is not returned to the library. Obviously, this would be an unacceptable choice for digitizing materials that have archival value. For those materials, non-destructive scanning would be the only choice but the price is much higher as human intervention is required. For film and bound-book non-destructive scanning, companies such as Hein provide reasonably priced services to their institutional customers.2

1 See http://1dollarscan.com/pricing.php.
If your library has a collection of materials to scan that is large enough to justify purchasing scanning equipment there are a few things to remember. First, flat-bed scanners, even though very popular and cheap, are poorly suited for scanning monographs. The scans from a flat-bed scanner will often be low quality and pressing the book face down on the scanner may result in damage to the spine. The alternative is using a plenary/overhead scanner. This avoids damage to the book and often results in a much higher quality scan. The disadvantage, however, is that these scanners are considerably more expensive than a flat-bed scanner. You can purchase a basic unit from Atiz starting at around $6000³ or you can make an overhead scanner yourself using two SLR cameras and a “DIY” kit for even less.⁴ To make these scanned documents searchable, you will need to purchase OCR software. Many libraries already have licenses for Adobe Acrobat which has a price of $300 (or $120 with an educational discount)⁵ There are other OCR products available (such as ABBYY FineReader) that have a higher cost but also promise a higher accuracy rate.

Once you have the necessary equipment, and have selected the materials to be digitized, you can begin creating a workflow of what metadata fields are going to be collected and how these materials are going to be stored and accessed. Many libraries are purchasing institutional software to host their electronic files.⁶ This makes it easier to create a controlled vocabulary and ensure consistency of metadata. Other libraries are adding these digital assets to their online collection using next-generation ILS software. Collaborative documents, such as provided by Google Docs, may be helpful especially when a digitization project includes multiple staff members. This helps to ensure that material is not scanned twice and helps to improve consistency.

⁴ See http://www.diybooksscanner.org/
⁶ Such as BePress’ Digital Commons (http://digitalcommons.bepress.com/) or Dspace (http://www.dspace.org/)

Another advantage of purchasing your own equipment is that once your digitization project is complete, you can use it for document delivery and inter-library loan services. Patrons love being able to get book or practice guide chapters delivered to their email accounts. At Santa Clara, we purchased a student scanning kiosk (the Zeutschel Zeta⁷) that has become immensely popular among our students. Students love being able to quickly and easily digitize a document and share it with classmates or professors. We have also noticed a decline in photocopier usage in the library as students are becoming increasingly tempted to make electronic, rather than print, copies of their documents.

PROFESSIONAL READING IN REVIEW
Elisabeth McKechnie and Susan Llano
U.C. Davis Law Library

The sixth annual listing of the top legal “blawgs” or blogs is chock full of interesting resources for the law librarian. The categories run the gamut from the “Business of Law” to “Legal Research and Writing” and “Legal Technology.” Investigating many of the candidates (and runners-up), I found many entertaining and informative websites.

In her article, O’Grady compares the purchase of Knowledge Mosaic by LexisNexis with the disastrous acquisition of LivEdgar by Westlaw in 2005, which resulted in the gutting of the GSI staff and the erosion of the product. Looking ahead, she foresees that Knowledge Mosaic may survive the transition to Lexis in a healthier way than did LivEdgar.

This brief article discusses the continuing drop in law school applications, currently a 24.6% drop from 2012. He goes on to discuss potential fallout from the decrease, including law school closures and staff layoffs. The article is full of links related to the topical area as well as the latest on Villanova’s troubles with the ABA.

In this follow-up article to one he wrote two years ago called “How to Kill a Law Firm,” Jordan Furlong describes what he believes are the leading problems with law schools and what he thinks can be done to save them. He suggests that law schools look at themselves as if they were competitors trying to supplant the traditional law school model. In other words, they should act as many successful businesses have been doing for years: exploit your own weaknesses and make improvements to your model before someone beats you to it. He identified four ways that law schools are “killing” themselves (starting with price and faculty) and then listed five ways in which law schools might be “saved.” Some of his suggestions may be controversial, like his idea of law schools dropping their ABA accreditation, but the article is thought-provoking and makes for an interesting read.

Bexar County in Texas is in the planning stages of a fully digital library (they are touting it as the first of its kind in the country) called BiblioTech. This library is the brain child of a Bexar County Judge, Nelson Wolff, who got the idea while reading a biography of Steve Jobs. Consequently, the new library will be modeled after an Apple store. Costs will be kept down by using existing buildings instead of constructing new ones. The collection will start with 10,000 titles and the building is slated to have some library features such as study spaces and meeting rooms. Many counties across the country are probably waiting to see how this model works out.

Plans continue apace for the upcoming NOCALL Spring Institute to be held Friday/Saturday April 12 – 13, 2013, at the Sacramento Capitol-Plaza Holiday Inn near Old Sacramento. The Institute’s theme, Fruitful Endeavors: Meeting and Exceeding the Challenges of the New Normal, reflects both the abundance of the Sacramento Delta and Central Valley region, as well as the challenges and possibilities law librarians are experiencing at this time.

Presentations include a very dynamic double program about Ebooks from the perspective of public and academic librarians offering these new digital resources to their patrons, as well as from the perspective of legal publishing vendors who are beginning to roll out new Ebook legal products to law librarians and our patrons. Come prepared with lots of questions, as the Programs Committee feels this should spark some lively debate.

We are offering substantive programs on California water law and wine law, plus stay tuned for some insights on using social networking tools in our work environments. We have several other dynamic speakers lined up, plus a light and frothy program about Beer and Beer brewing followed by a beer tasting from a local Sacramento brewery. Something for everyone! Our networking social this year will be held Friday evening at the CalExpo Harness Races, where one race will be named for and provide PR for NOCALL.

Grants will be offered to attend this premier event. Stay tuned for more information on how to apply for a grant. Grant information will be available when the member registration flyer is submitted to the NOCALL listserv and posted to the NOCALL website in February. Grant applications will be accepted through March 1.

Vendors are in process of registering now, and we have several sponsors. We anticipate sending out NOCALL member registration information no later than mid-February. The Holiday Inn discounted rate is available through March 10, so mark your calendars now and get ready for excellent continuing professional education combined with some fun networking activities. We’ll see you soon in California’s Capital City!
